"You can't arrest me for that, it's less than two grams!" He was right, I was told, it weighed in at 1.86 gm. He will not be charged for the drug possession.

Back at the jail as the deputy filled out the report, another police officer brought in a woman suspected of assault and possession of drugs. The amount was 2.6 grams and the corrections officer who stopped in to let us know let out a huge sigh, saying, "It makes you think about how many crimes they committed to get to this place now."

That struck me as a statement. Finally a suspect would be held accountable.

There were open needles, rats, filth and human feces everywhere. I am told there was a homicide a week ago in this camp. Apparently it's not the first that has occurred here.I asked one of the four deputies I was with if people turn to drugs after becoming homeless, or do they become homeless and find their way to these camps because of drugs? He answered with authority: "100 percent of those living in these camps are homeless because of drugs."Enabling behaviors doesn't helpIt's clear the number of able-bodied, homeless drug addicts who are committing crimes to feed their habit is growing. In facing the realities we experience in this county, it should never be about creating fear, but about sharing the truth so we can map a course to change it. When we deny or ignore the truth, we continue to enable, rather than disrupt behaviors.								Real Estate live in this environment? We must leverage enforcement into care or consequences. We must make it uncomfortable to do drugs and commit crimes. We must support those families that had to learn to stop enabling it their homes, by choosing to stop enabling it on our streets.

Finding solutions is critical

There is no one solution to this problem, but residents and business owners
